Balancing Work and Family

Working from home can be harder when children are around. If you are struggling to find the right balance between work and family, try these tips:

► Prioritize. Figure out which tasks really matter and put them first. If you don’t have access to services, keep up with house and yard work as best you can.

► Set limits. Look for ways to “meet halfway” and set boundaries that protect both work and family time. Schedule times for “quiet play” (such as when you’re on a conference call) and times when louder, more boisterous behavior is allowed.

► “Clock in” and “clock out.” Set a time each day when you switch gears from work to family mode. Playing with your child or doing chores is a good way to mark this transition.

► Share homework time. If you need to work after hours, consider doing it at the same time your child does any homework assignments. Make sure you allow time to help your child with a difficult math problem or a confusing English assignment.

► Assign chores. Helping with house and yard work and pet care will teach children responsibility. Teens may be capable of watching younger siblings for short periods of time.

► Schedule family dinners. Commit to having at least one sit-down dinner with your entire family per week. Use this time to share stories and discuss plans for the future.

► Don’t go it alone. You may not be able to share caregiving duties with family or friends right now, but you can still stay in touch, share stories, and discuss worries or frustrations.

► Make time for you. Parents get grouchy when they don’t have enough play time too. Set aside time for a favorite activity or hobby, and make sure your spouse or partner gets time for him or herself too. If you are a single parent, set aside a half hour for you after your child goes to bed.

LifeMatters can offer ideas on how to balance work and family obligations during a period of social distancing. Call 24/7/365.