

Interested in studying environmental science?

patagonia

Scholarships for incoming freshmen interested in environmental sciences

Incoming freshmen at California State University, Fresno who intend to major in science and mathematics, particularly environmental sciences, are invited to apply to become Patagonia® Scholars, a scholarship program covering the costs of tuition, housing, meal plan and books for an academic year. The scholarship is renewable for up to three additional years, for a total of no more than four years per recipient.

Students can demonstrate their interest in environmental sciences through high school coursework, science fairs, community service or ecological activism. Preference will be given to applicants who have a demonstrated an interest in African American or Native American cultures through any past efforts or activities such as previously performed research involving such cultures, participation in cultural activities, events or causes, or community service promoting or benefiting these cultures.

The Fresno State Scholarship Office may select up to two qualified applicants to become Patagonia® Scholars.

For more details on applying, please contact:
Roxanne Hinds, Development Director
College of Science and Mathematics
California State University, Fresno
559-278-8597

