

John Capitman, Ph.D.

Dr. John Capitman is the Executive Director for the Central Valley Health Policy Institute and the Nickerson Professor of Public Health, College of Health and Human Services, California State University Fresno. Capitman brings an extensive background in research on health inequities, long-term care, substance abuse, and racial/ethnic disparities in cancer care and outcomes. Capitman was formerly a professor and director of long-term care studies in the Schneider Institute for Health Policy at the Heller School for Social Policy and Management at Brandeis University. He has conducted research on increasing the participation of elders in health and long-term care decisions, supporting informal caregivers for persons with disabilities, and limiting sales of alcohol and tobacco products to minors. Capitman has taught and wrote about how social location influences health and the use of health services. He has published in the areas of: financing, organization, and delivery of community care and the integration prevention, behavioral health and chronic care management services in primary care. He leads the Health Policy Leadership Program now in its 8th cohort of emerging leaders from throughout the region who explore opportunities to address regional health problems. Capitman received his BA in Linguistics from Yale University and his PhD in Social Psychology from Duke University. He is a founder and Board member for VISIONS, Inc. a non-profit provider of multicultural training and consultation.